Tag Archives: Which Pencil Now that the holidays are over I'm back to doing some product posting that I have in-store and some that I may have purchased in my holiday shopping. First, I just want to say one more time this year to thank you for supporting Local Grain's brick and mortar location. If you've not yet visited, I'd really encourage you to stop by. I've got a set of value boxes set up that I'm trying to finish and another set of value sets that I'm still working on. As far as this month, some product has reached the end of its shelf life and some is about to be removed. I'm not sure what's more sad, the shelf life of these products or the anticipation that it's only a matter of time before they're gone. For our fall collection, I came up with a bunch of fun wood and metal products I'm hoping you'll find interesting. I'll be back again soon with the next round of product and there's a good chance I'll be introducing a few new products to the store in the process. If you're looking for some fall and winter home decoration ideas, then you've come to the right place. This month's theme is "Fruits & Flowers" and it's perfect for fall and winter decor. I've included a selection of products that can be used to create wreaths, seasonal decor, and anything else you can come up with. It's also what led me to creating some gift card holders. I'm absolutely in love with this design and hope you'll be too. I've included a selection of patterns for you. I have two designs that I'm currently working on so there'll be more to come. Why the Mind-Body Connection Matters for Regaining Health 10/14/2017 The Institute for Health and the Environment recently hosted its Fall 2017 wellness symposium, titled "Why the Mind-Body Connection Matters for Regaining Health." The symposium was designed to help attendees understand the relationship between mind and body. In a statement made at the symposium, IHE Vice President of Health Promotion Michael S. Mayeux stated, "The mind-body connection is a growing field of study that has been successfully integrated into integrative health care." While the mind-body connection was not discussed in depth by medical doctors, it is widely recognized by psychotherapists, psychiatrists, complementary health practitioners, and naturopaths, according to the publication "The Mind-Body Connection in Medicine and the Practice of Integrative Health Care." The symposium explores mind-body interactions in seven key areas: stress and illness, emotional arousal and health, energy healing, hypnosis and healing, biofeedback, pain and the body, and the interaction between emotions and food. John Fries, M.D. emphasized that not only is it important to look at the mind-body connections in each of these areas, but also the connections between the different areas. Dr. Fries had his own experience with these areas. He said he was always a bit of a hypochondriac and had a strong fear of death. This fear was exacerbated when he suffered serious injuries in football as a child. He said, "I used hypnosis to help me overcome these deep-seated fears, and I believe that I owe my health to this intervention. I felt that I had to change my whole life to be able to believe that I would survive." However, as Dr. Fries became more successful as a sports doctor, his belief in his own healing abilities caused him to rely on these abilities too much and eventually he developed severe health issues. Fortunately, he realized that relying on his own healing abilities alone was not a solution, and he realized that he needed to seek help. Dr. Fries established a practice in mind-body medicine called "Building Health," and he has helped thousands of people over the past twenty-five years. Dr. Fries' session at the symposium also addressed the importance of finding a practitioner that has both medical and mind-body training.
