The first column is the columns I want to check, the second column is the criteria I want to match the corresponding value in the first column with. I want to check if the value in column 1 matches any of the values in column 2. If it doesn't then the value in the column for that row should be removed. test = ['a', 'a', 'b', 'c', 'c'] data = [1,2,3,4,5] df = pd.DataFrame({'col 1': [1, 2, 1, 3, 4], 'col 2':[1, 1, 2, 3, 3] }) Basically, test is a column full of the values I want to match,

What's New In?

Let's face it: this thing is ruining our day. We've all been there: you're working, playing or watching a video game, and by some miracle it doesn't crash or freeze up. That's why today we're going to start a war. We're going to battle the enemy... and win the day. You may have heard the ads: "Let's face it, Microsoft has ruined every new product they release." Although this may be true in some cases, they continue to produce high-quality software such as the Windows operating system, Office, Visual Studio, and even the Windows Store. While it is true that the Windows logo key is somewhat of a joke (why is it there anyway?), I Hate This Key is not meant to make fun of this specific feature. I Hate This Key is the result of a beefy, professional application that will create a real-time shield that prevents your Windows logo key from accidentally activating full-screen apps or exiting full-screen games (e.g. while playing a video). This program should never be used for malicious purposes, and I Hate This Key takes this very seriously. All of the following features are enabled: The possibility to enable or disable the Windows logo key. This feature has two advantages: Make the Windows logo key behave as normal: every button on your keyboard will keep the Windows logo key behavior (except for the Windows logo key itself). If the Windows logo key is disabled, no Windows logo key behavior will appear on your keyboard, regardless of any input. Force the Windows logo key to do what you want it to: you can force the Windows logo key to operate when buttons on your keyboard are pressed, or block the Windows logo key from operating in any situation. If the Windows logo key is enabled and you press the Windows logo key, the following action is executed: Disable the Windows logo key in the current (active) application or game. Block the Windows logo key from operating when another active application or game is active. Enable the Windows logo key in the current (active) application or game. However, if the Windows logo key is disabled, the following action is performed: Enable the Windows logo key in the current (active) application or game. Disable the Windows logo key in the current (active) application or game. If no active application or game is active, the Windows logo key remains disabled. The Windows
